SCHOOLING FOR THE FUTURE:

A Think Tank Discussion

Are you joining us?

Schools are one of the few points of stability in the lives of so many of our children and young people.

What happens in schools is therefore important as it so often sets the framework for how children and young people feel about themselves, how they perceive their life chances and ultimately, what kind of adult they become.

Evidence tells us that when young people experience a sense of purpose, connectedness and belonging in school, they perform better academically, their teachers feel more professionally fulfilled and their families accepted.

While central government sets the national framework, local government plays a significant role in shaping the conditions for schooling in their communities; working in partnership with early years' settings, schools, colleges, local communities, and other agencies - to champion equity of provision, promote inclusive practice and foster the conditions for school belonging and connectedness.

So, whether you are a policymaker, a headteacher or have a senior role in improving the learning outcomes for children and young people, please join us in this Think Tank discussion which provides the opportunity with peers to consider and review the policy, practice and purpose of our schooling systems.
